

Mr. Lebaron's Upcoming Trip to Antarctica

Posted on 12 October 2012. Tags: antarctica, lebaron, science

- Earth Environmental teacher, Mr. Lebaron is taking a trip to Antarctica
- College Professors will be joining Mr. Lebaron on the trip
- They will be going to the Mcurdo Station

Mr. Lebaron, a science teacher here at Lake Norman High School is taking a trip to Antarctica on November 1 through mid-December with some college professors to go beneath the glaciers and explore the lakes to see the bacteria that lives in them.

They will be in Antarctica during the continents summer period, with temperatures below freezing. Mr.

Lebaron and his crew will be going to the Mcurdo Station located on the coast of Antarctica. The closest civilization will be the country of New Zealand. Mcurdo is a research station that is open year-round and attracts many scientists and researchers.

One of the professors Mr. Lebaron is going with is a geologist from Northern Indiana University named Ross Powell. When Mr. Lebaron gets back, he will be presenting the information that he has to his classes here at Lake Norman High School and to an online journal. Also, they will have a question and answer page for students. Even regular people that want to learn about what they find during their trip can go to their journal and find information.